they took it out and unrolled it from the crackly paper there was a cry of delight. The children said it must be long to them all, but Bobby insisted it, too, must be his, and, in spite of the tears of the other kiddies, he took it.

That night, long after the other children were dreaming of their new skates and sleds, Bobby woke up and toosed about the bed, hunting a sleepy corner; for, though nurse had begged him not, he had caten too much cake at supper, and now could not sleep.

At last he decided he was thirsty, and called fretfully for water. But no one heard him, so he tumbled sleepily out of bed, clutching his little silver nug. Bobby had never been out of bed alone at night before, and was a wee bit frightened at first at the silence and shadows, but he knew there were not really any bugaboos that hurt little boys, so he trudged through the nursery on his way to the bathroom. As he pased by the dollhouse he heard an odd little voice say;

"Dinner is ready; I do wish you would"
